A Nation of Villains: Caribbean Pirates as a 18th Century Nation-Stateless

Project Author: Professor Bridgett Williams-Searle, History

Project Objectives:

My project examines the biographies, behaviors, and political philosophies of five thousand Caribbean pirates operating in the Atlantic littoral between 1680-1724 as a means of exploring the ways in which the early modern stateless operated in counterpoint to the evolving early modern capitalist state. In using these “villains of all nations” as a case study, I seek to reposition pirates as national actors and in doing so, refine the category “nation” as a theoretical and historical concept. The CREST fellowship will provide the time and funds necessary to conduct such research.

Conceptual, historical, and methodological framework

Piracy has fascinated English-language authors since the 18th century. Thanks to the 2007 publication of a comprehensive four-volume set of primary sources generated by captives, merchants, bureaucrats, jurists, biographers, and pirates themselves, one can recover the actions and words of the early modern low-born, people criminal by definition – the very persons least likely to make a dent in the political history of the state. By taking a hard look at their lives and behaviors on- and off-ship, their methods of organization, their economic practices, and their political utterances, I suggest that it will be possible to discover their understanding of pirates as a nation confederated against all who would infringe on their political and social liberties. By examining the whole of the
